Religion and power: politics in the later sixteenth century, 1567-1609

Case study to which the documents relate:
The Jesuit mission in China

Study the documents opposite and answer the questions below:

1. (a) In document A, why did the Jesuits shave their heads and beards?

   (b) In document A, what was the attitude of the 'educated elite' towards Buddhist monks?

   (c) According to document A, what sort of hat was worn by the Jesuits?

   (d) In document B, what did Matteo Ricci learn from visiting the Magistrates?

   (e) According to document B, how was Matteo Ricci's chair carried?

   (40)

2. (a) Which document, A or B, gives the better description of the clothes worn by the Jesuits? Refer to both documents in your answer.

   (b) Do both documents show that the Jesuits adapted well to life in China? Refer to both documents in your answer.

   (20)

3. (a) Give a reason why document A is a secondary source.

   (b) How is it suggested in document B that the Jesuits were not poor?

   (20)

4. What was achieved by the Jesuit mission in China?

   (20)

– Document A –

In this edited extract historian Nora C. Buckley refers to the changing appearance of the Jesuits in China.

In order to appear less noticeable in their surroundings, the Jesuits shaved their heads and beards and donned grey coats similar to those worn by Buddhist monks.

Later they abandoned their hooded grey coats, for Matteo Ricci had observed that Buddhist monks were not respected by the educated elite. He then persuaded the Jesuit leadership to approve a style of dress similar to that of the Chinese scholars and leisured class.

Now the Jesuits wore plum-coloured silk robes with blue borders and the traditional square black hat. They also let their hair and beards grow.

Source: Nora C. Buckley, 'Matteo Ricci in China, 1583-1610', History Today (September, 1977).

– Document B –

In this edited extract from his Journals, Matteo Ricci makes similar points.

Father Ricci realised that, when visiting the Magistrates, it was necessary to copy their ways.

For this reason he wore a silk robe for official visits, and the hat of the leisured class. When visiting, he always took along two servants. Also, he travelled in a chair carried on the shoulders of porters.

So, Father Ricci tried to make himself acceptable in order to win converts for Christ.

Rebellion and conquest in Elizabethan Ireland, 1558-1603

A (30 marks)
Recommended maximum time: 10 minutes

This edited extract refers to Shane O'Neill's visit to London, January 1562. Read it and answer the questions which follow.

Shane came to the court of Elizabeth with an escort of gallowglass [professional soldiers] armed with battle-axes. They were bare-headed, with flowing curls, yellow shirts, short tunics and rough cloaks.

O'Neill threw himself at the Queen's feet and, admitting the crime of rebellion, begged for pardon.

So strange were the Irish to the eyes of those at court that they might have come from China or America.

Source: Constantia Maxwell, Irish History from Contemporary Sources (London: Allen & Unwin, 1923).

1. What escort had Shane O'Neill?
2. How was his escort armed?
3. How was his escort dressed?

Kingdom v. colony – the struggle for mastery in Ireland, 1603-1660

A (30 marks)
Recommended maximum time: 10 minutes

During the plantation of Ulster Sir Hugh Montgomery, from Scotland, established a settlement in County Down, the beginning of which is described in this edited extract. Read it and answer the questions which follow.

Sir Hugh brought with him tradesmen such as smiths, masons and carpenters. They soon made cottages for themselves because sods and saplings were available, with rushes for thatch.

Merchants came from Belfast and set up a market. In the summer season, sometimes twice every week, the settlement was supplied from Scotland.

Sir Hugh built himself a house with oak planks from his own woods and slates from Scotland. The windows were fully glazed.

Source: Based on material in Jonathan Bardon, A Narrow Sea: the Irish-Scottish Connection in 120 Episodes (Dublin: Gill Books, 2018).

1. From what were the walls of the cottages made?
2. From what were the roofs of the cottages made?
3. What did merchants from Belfast contribute to the settlement?
4. What was one way in which Sir Hugh's house was better built than the tradesmen's cottages?

Establishing a colonial ascendancy, 1660-1715

A (30 marks)
Recommended maximum time: 10 minutes

This edited extract deals with the career of Samuel Louis Crommelin. Read it and answer the questions which follow.

Samuel Louis Crommelin was born in Picardy, France, in 1652. In the late 1690s we find him running a linen production centre, with a bleach-yard along Bridge Street, in Lisburn, Co. Down.

On 20 April, 1707, a fire gutted most of the town centre compelling him to consider moving. However, in 1715, he had the good fortune to receive a government pension of 400 pounds. Expanding his business, he set up sailcloth production in Waterford, Cork and elsewhere.

Crommelin died on 17 July, 1727, having – along with other Huguenot businessmen – contributed significantly to the growth of the Irish linen industry.

Source: Based on Crommelin entry in Royal Irish Academy, Dictionary of Irish Biography, Vol. 2 (Cambridge: CUP, 2009).

1. What did Louis Crommelin run in Lisburn?
2. Why did Crommelin consider leaving Lisburn?
3. What help did Crommelin receive from the government?

Ireland: Topic 5

Colony versus kingdom – tensions in mid-18th century Ireland, 1715-1770

A (30 marks)
Recommended maximum time: 10 minutes

This edited extract deals with the Whiteboys. Read it and answer the questions which follow.

Disturbances broke out in Tipperary towards the end of 1761 when groups of men assembled, by night, to level the ditches which landlords and graziers had erected around the commons on which people had, until then, enjoyed free grazing rights.

This Whiteboy movement was oath-bound and it also opposed the payment of tithes. Its members assembled in great numbers, wearing uniforms, sounding horns, carrying torches, and often mounted on horses taken from their rightful owners.

Source: Based on material in T.D. Williams (ed.), Secret Societies in Ireland (Dublin: Gill & Macmillan, 1973).

1. Where and when did disturbances break out?
2. Who had built the ditches?
3. Apart from ditches, what did the Whiteboys oppose?
4. Briefly, how is it suggested that the Whiteboys were well organised?
5. Give one reason why there was agrarian unrest in Ireland, 1715-1770.

This is an edited extract from an account of Belfast town centre in 1770. Read it and answer the questions which follow.

The houses are well built and slated, with the streets pretty wide. The road surface is bad in some places, but not in general. There are heaps of dung in many streets, which must be a great nuisance to the inhabitants. Water pipes would improve drainage.

A new Town Hall is now being built, a gift from Lord Donegall. Though handsome in design, it is scarcely long enough for its height. I hear that the lower part is to serve for an Exchange and the upper part for an Assembly Room.

Source: Quoted in Jonathan Bardon, A Shorter Illustrated History of Ulster (Belfast: Blackstaff Press, Ltd., 1996).

1. What positive comment is made about the houses?
2. What criticism is made of the streets?
3. Who was presenting the Town Hall to Belfast?
4. What was to occupy the upper part of the Town Hall?
5. What was the principal industry in the Belfast region at that time?

Europe from Renaissance to Reformation, 1492-1567

A (30 marks)
Recommended maximum time: 10 minutes

This edited extract refers to the port of Seville. Read it and answer the questions which follow.

Seville, a thriving port with 100,000 inhabitants, great trading houses, and streets thronged with merchants, sailors and dockers, was the heart of trade with the New World.

Every Spring a fleet of ships would assemble there and, in May, it would sail to Vera Cruz in Mexico. The fleet would winter in the New World. Then, laden with silver from Peru and closely guarded, they would sail for home.

Europe depended on a supply of new silver. Merchants looked for payment. Shipbuilders needed a quick return on their investment. Bankers risked much and expected high profits.

Source: D. Lindsay and M. R. Price, A Portrait of Europe: Authority and Challenge (Oxford: OUP, 1975).

1. How is it suggested that Seville was a 'thriving port'?
2. To where would the fleet sail?
3. What would the ships bring from Peru?
4. Who hoped to benefit from the trade between Europe and the New World?
5. Apart from silver, what other goods from the New World reached Seville?

In his Political Testament (1624), from which this is an edited extract, Cardinal Richelieu noted the weakness of the King's position in France when he entered royal service. Read this extract and answer the questions which follow.

At that time the nobles and the governors of the provinces behaved as if they were independent of the King. Also, the parliaments [higher courts] attempted to reduce royal authority, while increasing their own.

Foreign alliances favoured the interests of individuals rather than those of the public. The King's weak position forced him to make hasty decisions. It was not possible for the King's wisdom and courage to win for him the rewards that he deserved.

Source: J.H. Robinson, Readings in European History, Vol. II (New York: Ginn & Company, 1906).

1. Who behaved as if they were independent of the King?

This edited extract refers to the attempts of Tsar Peter the Great to 'Westernise' Russia. Read it and answer the questions which follow.

The tsar worked to reform fashion and he himself set the example. Until then Russians had always worn long beards. He ordered that gentlemen and merchants and others – except priests and peasants – should each pay a tax if they wished to keep their beards.

He also reformed Russian clothing. Their garments were very long, reaching to the heel. He ordered boyars [nobles], and all those who held positions at his court, to dress after the French fashion.

This edited extract refers to international trade. Read it and answer the questions which follow.

Jamaica was ten times the size of other English islands in the Caribbean. It was well located for plunder and trade, with the added advantage of a superb harbour at Port Royal.

As Port Royal prospered, the island merchants accumulated the capital to purchase a slave labour force (some 45,000 by 1715) and plant cash crops – cocoa originally, but soon to be overtaken by sugar.

Indigo, cotton, ginger and pimento were also part of Jamaica's important contribution to Britain's international economy.

This is an edited extract from a letter (dated 15 May, 1776) from Maria Theresa of Austria to her daughter, Marie Antoinette, Queen of France. Read it and answer the questions which follow.

You never cared to read or to apply yourself in any way and I was pleased to see you devoting yourself to music.

But, for a year now, there has been no question of either reading or music; and I hear that there is nothing but racing and hunting, and always without the King.

You will say: "He knows and approves." I reply that he is fine and good and that is still the more reason that you should be careful how you behave.
